FOREWORD

This is my final report as Chair of the Committee on Standards in Public Life after five years in the post. The experience has been instructive as well as pleasurable.

During my tenure the Committee has conducted two major inquiries – on MPs' expenses and party political finance. It is currently conducting a third, a stock take of best practice. The recommendations of the first were accepted in full by all three main parties within hours of publication, but were modified in certain less important respects by the Independent Parliamentary Standards Authority, the body set up by Parliament to implement them. Subsequent iterations of some of the rules have brought them closer to our original intentions.

Shortly after the publication of last year's Annual Report, the Committee published its thirteenth report Political Party Finance - Ending the big donor culture (November 2011). This issue was first considered by our predecessors in 2005. As I stated last year, I am under no illusion that structural changes to the system of party funding will be easy. The issues are complex. Some of the possible solutions are controversial and, as expected, have met considerable resistance. Our four main recommendations – capping donations, switching to “opting in” for trade union affiliation fees, reducing campaign expenditure and increasing state funding - require the parties to face up to some difficult decisions. They may be tempted to put them off. At the time of writing, we are still waiting to hear the outcome of cross-party discussions. But in a year which has seen further scandal relating to party funding this is not an issue which should be left any longer in the “too difficult” pile.

The latter part of this financial year was spent planning the most recent piece of work to be carried out by the Committee: Ethics and Best Practice - what works? This is a stock take of what has been achieved since the first Nolan report and a review of what drives high ethical standards in organisations. The damaging scandals in Parliament, banking and the media in recent years serve yet again to demonstrate how important high standards are to public business. By identifying what works we hope this piece of work will inform our future thinking and be useful to others involved in maintaining standards.

A further preoccupation during the year has been some of the changes to the local government standards regime brought in by the Localism Act 2012, which diverge significantly from previous recommendations we have made. We believe the new system is inherently risky and we will continue to monitor actively the situation.

This year has been one of change. Three committee members, Brian Woods-Scawen, Elizabeth Vallance and Lloyd Clark, finished their terms in November 2011. They had each served seven years on the Committee and their departures represented a significant loss of experience and knowledge. We were saddened to hear that Brian Woods-Scawen lost his battle against illness in June 2012. Delays in the recruitment process undertaken by the Cabinet Office, conducted according to public appointment rules, meant that our three new members, Sheila Drew Smith, Patricia Moberly and Richard Thomas, were unable to begin their five year terms until May 2012, which left the Committee depleted for nearly six months. However, I am glad to report that the Committee is now benefitting from their knowledge and experience.

Also during this year the Committee moved out of its offices in Great Smith Street and into a new office in the Cabinet Office building at 1 Horse Guards Road.

We are currently subject to a triennial review. I have no doubt myself of the importance of retaining a committee such as ours, able to offer independent advice and commentary across the whole field of standards in public life, even when that is occasionally inconvenient or embarrassing to the Government of the day. Of course, it would be possible to set up ad hoc reviews every time an issue arose. But our continuity of membership means that we are able both to keep an eye open for emerging issues and to be proactive about raising them. I also suspect that we are significantly cheaper than a succession of ad hoc reviews would be.

It has been a privilege to chair this committee. I take this opportunity to thank again the members of the Committee, past and present, for their hard work and support over the past year and indeed throughout my term. I am confident that whoever takes over as chair will inherit an effective and committed team, dedicated to maintaining and improving ethical standards in public life.

Christopher Kelly

INTRODUCTION

1. The Committee on Standards in Public Life has wide terms of reference.

“To examine current concerns about standards of conduct of all holders of public office, including arrangements relating to financial and commercial activities, and make recommendations as to any changes in present arrangements which might be required to ensure the highest standards of propriety in public life and to review issues in relation to the funding of political parties, and to make recommendations as to any changes in present arrangements.”<sup>1</sup>

2. The Committee fulfils this role partly through its formal inquiries. In addition, we routinely monitor and consider issues and concerns relating to standards in public life, track public perception of standards of conduct by public office holders and seek to promote the Seven Principles of Public Life. We contribute to public policy development through meetings, seminars, speaking engagements, and by responding to consultation papers on relevant issues.
3. This report provides an overview of the Committee’s activities over the course of the past financial year. The first part of the year was spent finalising an inquiry into the funding of political parties. In the second half we planned for the Committee’s next report on ethics and best practice in public organisations. Other important developments that have required our attention have included the passage of the Localism Act 2012, Government proposals on the regulation of lobbying and the recall of MPs, and developments in arrangements for administering and regulating MPs’ expenses and allowances.
4. The appendices to the report provide detail about the structure and finances of the Committee.

OVERVIEW OF ACTIVITIES

Party political finance

5. The Committee spent a year looking at the issues surrounding the funding of political parties. We took oral evidence over eleven days in London, Belfast, Edinburgh and Cardiff and heard from academics, journalists, political parties, representatives of other interested organisations and individuals with relevant personal experience. We also considered the regulation of party funding in other countries. We were left in no doubt by the evidence that the reliance of all three main parties on very large donations from a small number of individuals or organisations is a matter of considerable, justified public concern.
6. The inquiry report was published in November 2011. It contained 24 recommendations. The four most important were:
  - A cap on donations, as the only satisfactory way of addressing the issue directly. We recommended that this should be set at £10,000 from any individual to any one party in any year. In previous, abortive discussions some years ago a cap of £50,000 was suggested. The Committee felt that this was much too high to convince anyone that the issue had been properly addressed. It would allow an individual legitimately to donate a total of £250,000 over the life of a Parliament. Even £10,000 is high by international standards.
  - The arrangements for affiliation fees paid by trade unions to the Labour Party to be changed so that individual members were required to opt in rather than, as now, to opt out. Our evidence convinced us that the public are as concerned about very large donations from trade unions as they are about donations from other sources. We recognise that this is a matter of considerable historical and symbolic importance and that the change would have some administrative implications. But we took the view that it is a necessary step, together with a number of other related changes, if affiliation fees are reasonably to be regarded as the bundling together of a series of individual payments to which the cap could be applied individually. The alternative would be to apply the cap to total affiliation fees paid by an individual union, which would have very considerable financial implications.
  - The provision of a relatively limited amount of additional state funding for political parties. The Committee recognised that this would not be a popular recommendation, particularly at the present time. We would not have proposed it if we thought there was any alternative, at least in the short term, which allowed an appropriate cap on donations while still leaving the parties with sufficient funds to play their necessary part in our democratic system. It would not be a new departure –significant amounts of public funding are already provided to political parties, though not everyone is aware of that. The additional amounts involved are relatively small, possibly equivalent to no more than about 50p per elector per year, part of which could potentially be found by redirecting existing forms of state support. Many other democracies make much larger amounts available to their political parties out of public funds.

- A reduction of around 15 per cent in the limits which already apply to the amounts parties can spend on campaigning at the time of an election. Our view is that it would be unacceptable to ask taxpayers to provide a higher subsidy to political parties without simultaneously obliging the parties to cut their spending. Our expectation is that there is some scope for doing this because of the potential of social marketing techniques and other electronic methods of communication to lower the cost of campaigning. It could well be possible and desirable to reduce the limits by more than 15 per cent.
7. Other recommendations included reducing bureaucracy for smaller parties, widening the scope of policy development grants, a unified spending limit for all elections, and full transparency of donations and donors in Northern Ireland in line with the rest of the UK by 2015. We also addressed some of the measures which would have to be taken to combat avoidance, particularly, as in the US, though the use of third parties.
  8. We recommended that the majority of new arrangements should not be brought in until the beginning of the next Parliament, expected to be in 2015. This was partly because of the hope that financial pressures might have eased slightly by then, partly to allow adequate time for any necessary legislation, for the parties to adjust to the changes and for the Electoral Commission to prepare for a different set of enforcement requirements.
  9. There has as yet been no formal response to the report from the Government. We understand that discussions between the three main parties about the implications of the report are continuing. There is not a great deal of time to resolve the issue if the parties are to honour their election Manifesto commitments on the issue.

Ethics and best practice

10. Seventeen years after the publication of the original Nolan report it seems appropriate to take stock of what has happened since and of what we have learnt about what works best in current circumstances in promoting high standards of ethical behaviour.
11. The seven principles of public life set out in the first Nolan report have formed the cornerstone of much of the ethical regulation which has since developed in the UK. Numerous codes of conduct –for

MPs, ministers, peers, local councillors and public bodies – have drawn upon them. We have been looking at how successful these efforts have been and at some of the tensions and dilemmas which have emerged, for example between greater transparency and misuse of information or between helpful codification and over-prescription

12. We are discussing these and other issues at a series of seminars with regulators and those affected by regulation. We have also asked the public to contribute their views on the key issues and themes. We hope to publish our findings at the end of 2012.

STANDARDS CHECK

MPs' expenses and allowances

13. The Committee welcomed the value for money scrutiny of the Independent Parliamentary Standards Authority (IPSA) published by the National Audit Office (NAO) in July 2011. The report made a number of observations about IPSA's performance and some recommendations for the future. The NAO concluded that IPSA had done well in the time available to create a functioning expenses scheme which safeguarded public money and had made a significant contribution to increasing public confidence. But they also thought IPSA's new scheme did not give sufficient importance to supporting MPs' spending in a cost-effective way and was not user-friendly, hindering MPs from doing their jobs.
14. The Committee recommended in our twelfth report, MPs' Expenses and Allowance: Supporting Parliament, safeguarding the taxpayer (Nov 2009) that new MPs should not be able to use their expenses to employ family members at public expense, though existing MPs who already did so should be allowed to continue to do so for one more Parliament. We remain disappointed that IPSA chose not to implement this recommendation, though they have limited MPs to the employment of one family member. We continue to be concerned about the potential for abuse – perceived or otherwise – which the practice of employing family members creates, with the attendant possibility of new damage to the reputation of Parliament.
15. We were invited to provide evidence to the inquiry carried out by the Committee on Members' Expenses into the Parliamentary Standards Act 2009. Our response emphasised the requirement for the independent determination and scrutiny of expenses.

Local government standards

16. The Localism Act received Royal Assent in January 2012. The legislation abolished Standards for England, the body charged with the oversight of the local authority standards regime, with effect from 31 March 2012.
17. The Committee welcomed the Act's objectives of returning to a standards regime operated at a local level and recognised the importance of limiting vexatious complaints. But we were concerned that the original bill went too far in dismantling some of the other elements in the previous regime. We were pleased therefore that amendments were made in the House of Lords to maintain a mandatory requirement for each Local Authority to have a code of conduct based on the Nolan Principles and to retain some provision to investigate non-adherence to the code.
18. We remain concerned, however, about what we regard as inadequate sanctions in the new arrangements for non-adherence to local authorities' new codes. We believe that it is insufficient to leave any instances of poor conduct to be dealt with only through the criminal law or through the discipline of the ballot box. In our view there have been numerous examples of types of behaviour for which a criminal prosecution would not be appropriate, or easy to undertake, but which most people would think fall short of the standards expected of public office holders and deserving of some sort of sanction.
19. We believe that there is a significant risk under the new arrangements that inappropriate conduct by local authority members will not be dealt with effectively, eroding public confidence in local government at a time when the scope of local decision-making in planning and other matters is being increased. We will continue to monitor the situation closely.

Civil service and public appointments

20. The Commissioner for Public Appointments, Sir David Normington, issued a consultation paper on proposals for amending the public appointments system with a view to making it more proportionate, principled and risk-based in June 2011. The existing regulatory system dated back to 1995 when it was established as a response to recommendations made by the Committee on Standards in Public Life in our first report.
21. The consultation paper suggested that good progress had been made over 15 years in establishing that ministerial appointments to public office should be on merit after a fair and open process and that clear processes were in place to guard against cronyism and political patronage. But it also detected dissatisfaction with the complexity of the processes which had developed and a perception that the focus was too much on getting the process right rather than getting the right outcome. The system had moved away from Nolan's original ambition that "regulation should be undertaken with a light touch and without introducing unnecessary bureaucracy". Sir David Normington suggested that the regulatory system was ready for a major overhaul to return it to something "clearer and simpler, more risk-based and more focused on the basic job of getting the best candidates from a strong and diverse field and that the responsibility for meeting the core requirements of the system should rest firmly with departments".

22. The Committee welcomed Sir David's proposals to reform the system processes as a sensible principles-based approach to the regulation of public appointments that would also bring the regulatory framework further into line with what Lord Nolan had originally envisaged. The real test will be whether departments respond with energy and commitment. We will watch with interest.

Lobbying

23. The Prime Minister, when in opposition, referred to lobbying as the "next big scandal waiting to happen."<sup>2</sup> We agree. Since the last election a number of useful steps have been taken to address this issue, including the publication of ministers' departmental diaries so that it is apparent who has been meeting whom and on what subjects, provided such meetings take place officially.

24. In addition, in January 2012 the Government's published a consultation paper proposing the introduction of a statutory register of lobbyists. The proposal was that third party lobbyists would be required to contribute to a statutory register on a quarterly basis, providing both client lists and the names of employees engaged in lobbying, and identifying where those employees were former ministers or senior civil servants.

25. The Committee was glad to have the opportunity to comment on the consultation paper. In our response we noted that opportunities for individuals and organisations to talk to policymakers and legislators were an important part of the process by which public policy is formulated and implemented. We take the view that lobbying is a legitimate and potentially beneficial activity when exercised responsibly and that in a democracy those affected by decisions need to have the opportunity to present their case.

26. But we suggested that there were legitimate public concerns that some individual lobbyists might be able to gain preferential access to decision-makers by dint of previous roles or for other reasons and that such access might still not be completely apparent. We argued that convincing reform of lobbying needed to address these issues directly and that a statutory register, by itself, was unlikely to do so. We suggested that more might be achieved by extending the new arrangements for making the existence of any meetings between lobbyists and policy makers apparent and by reforming party funding as we have suggested, so that any suspicion that donations can buy inappropriate access could be removed. We maintained that the information in the register about those engaged in lobbying should include former legislators, even where they have not held ministerial positions, and any close relatives of former or serving ministers, and that to make it more easily accessible, consideration should be given to a single database including relevant information about both lobbyists and ministerial meetings. We suggested that any contact with ministers which has a bearing on their official duties should be included in the published lists of ministerial meetings, regardless of how that contact occurs.

27. Reform of lobbying needs to be considered alongside the arrangements for vetting post-employment opportunities for former ministers and civil servants. We suggested that, to give some reassurance about its effectiveness, there may be scope for the Advisory Committee on Business Appointments to give greater publicity to their activities, including providing more summary information about the extent to which they are consulted about employment opportunities which are not then pursued as a result of their advice. For confidence reasons, we felt that departments should be required to publish summary information on cases they consider themselves under the business appointment rules, and that consideration should be given to asking accounting officers to certify annually that they have satisfied themselves that appropriate arrangements exist in their departments to ensure that officials are vigilant about contacts by lobbyists and that relevant ministerial and official contacts are appropriately reported.

Electoral reform

28. The Committee made a number of recommendations about electoral registration in its Eleventh report – Review of the Electoral Commission (2007). The key recommendation was the introduction of arrangements for individual registration to modernise the system and to help tackle electoral fraud.
29. In June 2011 the Government published plans to implement individual registration by the next election. Every elector will have to register individually and provide identifying information which will be used to verify their entitlement to be included on the electoral register. Steps will also be taken to try to make the register more complete. Overall, the proposals address many of the issues raised by the Committee in its report. We welcome them.

30. We remain concerned, however, about certain aspects of the proposals, in particular dropping the requirement to produce a signature as one of an individual's three personal identifiers. We do not want electoral registration to become an overly bureaucratic exercise and accept that Government services should be as user-friendly as possible. But in our view electoral registration is too important to be treated like any ordinary transaction. The right to vote is the cornerstone of our democracy. The process for registration should accordingly be treated with at least equivalent seriousness as applying for a passport or driving licence. It is not possible in those cases to complete the application process by telephone or online, to reduce the risk of fraudulent applications.

31. We also have reservations about the proposal to align Northern Ireland legislation on individual registration with that in the rest of the United Kingdom, by reducing some of the current requirements there. The current arrangements have been shown to be effective in restoring confidence in the electoral process in the Province. If anything, we think that alignment should be achieved by standardising on the Northern Ireland model.

Independent adviser on ministerial interests

32. In a report released in March 2012<sup>3</sup>, the Public Administration Select Committee (PASC) suggested that the Independent Adviser on Ministerial Interests was in practice insufficiently independent, as he or she is appointed personally by the Prime Minister, is supported from within the Cabinet Office, and cannot instigate his or her own investigations. Investigations can only be undertaken at the request of the Prime Minister.

33. This Committee recommended the establishment of an Independent Adviser on Ministerial Interests in 2003. We subsequently recommended that the Adviser should be given the power to instigate inquiries – much like the Parliamentary Commissioner for Standards. We continue to believe that the role should have the power to initiate inquiries, not least because this would help depoliticise the decision to refer an allegation to the Adviser. Decisions relating to Ministers following any investigation must clearly be a matter for the Prime Minister. But we continue to believe that strengthening the independence of the Adviser in this way would enable allegations about ministers' conduct to be seen to be handled fairly and provide greater assurance to the public that this has happened. Events during the last 12 months have reinforced this view.

Draft bill on the recall of MPs

34. The Committee welcomed the opportunity to comment on the Government's proposals providing for recall of Members of Parliament. A draft Bill, published in December 2011, would introduce a power of recall, allowing voters to force a by-election where an MP was alleged to have engaged in serious wrongdoing, provided that a petition calling for a by-election had been signed by ten per cent of his or her constituents.
35. The Committee supports the principle that constituents should be able to petition for the recall of an MP whose conduct falls seriously below the standards expected of those elected to public office but which does not trigger automatic disqualification under the Representation of the People Act 2001. The proposals would give the House a broader range of sanctions to use in occasional cases of serious wrongdoing, while leaving the final judgement on an MP's conduct to their constituents.
36. We thought, however, that the relatively low number of signatures required for a successful petition could risk leaving the process open to abuse through manipulation of postal or proxy votes. We suggested that Parliament might wish to consider banning the use of signatures sent though the post or by proxy. We supported the low campaign spending limit proposed in respect of recall petitions.

Membership of the Committee on Standards and Privileges

37. In our Twelfth report on MPs' expenses and allowances we recommended that there should be at least two lay members on the House of Commons Committee on Standards and Privileges as a step towards enhancing public acceptance of the robustness and independence of the Parliamentary disciplinary process. We therefore welcomed the announcement in July 2012 that the House of Commons had found a way to implement this recommendation and had begun the process of recruiting three lay members to sit on its Standards Committee.

REPRESENTATIONS AND SPEECHES

38. Over the course of the year, the Chair has spoken at a number of events on standards issues:
- In May 2011 Sir Christopher Kelly gave a speech at Brasenose College, Oxford.
  - In June 2011 Sir Christopher attended an International Colloquy in Strasbourg to discuss ethics and transparency as solutions to public corruption, malfunctioning and waste in the public sector.
  - In November 2011 Sir Christopher spoke to a group from the Public Administration International

(PAI) Public Service Commissions study programme on the role of the Committee.

39. In January 2012 the Committee held an open seminar on researching public attitudes towards standards and trust in public life. The event was open to the public

40. Transcripts of the speeches and the seminar are available on our website: www.public-standards.org.uk.

- Other Committee Members also spoke about the work of the Committee and standards issues, including at the Association of Chief Police Officers Professional Standards Conference in September 2011.

APPENDIX 1: ABOUT THE COMMITTEE

Terms of reference

41. The Committee on Standards in Public Life was established under the chairmanship of the Rt. Hon. Lord Nolan by the then Prime Minister, the Rt. Hon. John Major MP, in October 1994, with the following terms of reference:

“To examine current concerns about standards of conduct of all holders of public office, including arrangements relating to financial and commercial activities, and make recommendations as to any changes in present arrangements which might be required to ensure the highest standards of propriety in public life.”<sup>4</sup>

42. The following month Mr Major said of the Committee:

“It is to act as a running authority of reference – almost you might say, an ethical workshop called in to do running repairs.”<sup>5</sup>

43. On 12 November 1997, the then Prime Minister, the Rt. Hon. Tony Blair MP, announced additional terms of reference:

“To review issues in relation to the funding of political parties and to make recommendations as to any changes in present arrangements.”<sup>6</sup>

44. The Committee’s remit covers England and the devolved nations of Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland. It covers ministers, civil servants and advisers, Members of Parliament and UK Members of the European Parliament, board members and senior officers of non-departmental public bodies (NDPBs) and of NHS bodies, non-ministerial office holders, members and other senior officers of other bodies discharging publicly-funded functions and elected members and senior officers of local authorities.

Status

45. The Committee is an independent advisory non-departmental public body (NDPB). Its members are appointed by the Prime Minister. Seven of its members, including the chair, are chosen through open competition under the rules of the Office of the Commissioner for Public Appointments (OCPA). The remaining three members are nominated by the three main political parties. The Committee is not founded in statute and has no legal powers to compel witnesses to provide evidence or to enforce its recommendations. Nor does it have any powers to investigate individual allegations of misconduct. It presents its recommendations to the Prime Minister and publishes them simultaneously.

Funding and administration

46. The Committee receives its budget from the Cabinet Office. Day-to-day responsibility for financial controls and budgetary mechanisms are delegated to the secretary of the Committee. The Secretary and the rest of the secretariat are permanent civil servants employed by the Cabinet Office or on secondment from other departments or elsewhere. The current Secretary is seconded from the House of Commons administration.

Policy on openness

47. In its first report the Committee defined the Seven Principles of Public Life. The Committee has always sought to implement these principles in its own work, including the principle of openness.

48. The Secretary of the Committee has responsibility for the operation and maintenance of the Committee's publication scheme under the Freedom of Information Act 2000. Most of the information held by the Committee is readily available, and does not require a Freedom of Information Act request before it can be accessed. The Committee can be contacted in writing, by email, by telephone or by fax. The public can also access information via the Committee's website. Requests for information under the Freedom of Information Act should be made to the Secretary to the Committee at the following address:

The Chair is paid a flat rate of £50,000 a year, which has remained unchanged since his appointment. All members are reimbursed for expenses necessarily incurred.
50. For the period April 2011-March 2012 committee members other than the Chair claimed a total of £16,836 in fees and £3,890 in expenses. The Chair claimed no expenses.

Members provide details of any interests that might impinge on the work of the Committee through the Committee's register of interests, also available on the website at:

52. As an advisory Non-Departmental Public Body (NDPB), the Committee receives its delegated budget from the Cabinet Office. Responsibility for certain levels of authorisation, methods of control and day to day mechanisms have been delegated to the Secretary to the Committee.
53. The Secretary to the Committee is responsible for setting out the outputs and outcomes which the Committee plans to deliver with the resources for which they have delegated authority, and for reporting regularly on resource usage and success in delivering those plans. She is also responsible for maintaining a sound system of internal control over the resources for which she has delegated authority, and for providing the accounting officer with assurances that those controls are effective.
54. The Committee's original budget allocation for 2011-2012 was £638,000. In October 2011 £38,000 was returned, reducing the allocation to £600,000.
